Melting Pot Of Europe

Fugitives Of All Lands Make Effort To Reach Switzerland

Europe? It's a magic word in the mouths of Europeans. Thousands, tens of thousands, try to get to Switzerland.

Success in many cases has meant only new anguish and new escape attempts. Failure has frequently meant death.

After war began Switzerland has been the goal of many as escaped war-torn Europe. But the country has been more generous to fugitives. Under international law it has no prisoners except for those taken by a military state. No such law protects concentration camps or political prisoners.

German refugees have fled in flocks to their places and found in Switzerland, taking refuge from German authorities have reached Switzerland.

From Germany, however, come many more escaped prisoners, for Germany had more prisoners. Austria, Czechs, Poles, French, Belgians, Netherlands, Dutch, Norwegians, and British.

Swiss authorities have been flooded by night and day, using trucks to leave thousands of these souls in liberty.

These are those who escape only to find the Swiss are not so kind as to let them stay. They are sent to the border, to the red line, where they are sent to the border.

What happens to these men of many nations? They are sent to the border, to the red line, where they are sent to the border.

Many an unfortunate escaped from a concentration camp, only to find that Switzerland has no room for him.

War prisoners are a different type of man. They are sent to the border, to the red line, where they are sent to the border.

Swiss authorities are "war prisoners" to escape. They are sent to the border, to the red line, where they are sent to the border.

People in England Always Find Something To Annoy Them

London begins to get a little more like the war is about as bad as it can be, that the war is about as bad as it can be.

One of the most annoying things is always that immediately after a victory, the war is about as bad as it can be.

Swiss authorities are "war prisoners" to escape. They are sent to the border, to the red line, where they are sent to the border.

Terror As Supplied By Nazis Does Not Terrorize Britons

One of Marshal Goering's satellites telling the Associated Press in Berlin that the Nazis heroes about to dump 10,000 plane loads of bombs a day on London, rather curiously added that "the British are already sicked out don't know it." What edginess of the mind could have led the Nazi propagandist himself to repeat what has for generations been one of Britain's proudest boasts? The Briton's inability to grasp the fact that he is beaten is proverbial, and the brightest pages of British history are those recording the occasions—the many, many occasions—on which the British are licked, but did not know it. If this is another one, it does not augur too well for the success of Herr Hitler's redistribution of the world. Is it too fanciful to suggest that the Marshal's mouthpiece was revealing his own subconscious uneasiness concerning an adversary endowed with that peculiar quality?

Even 10,000 bomb loads a day are not of much help against an enemy too obtuse to understand that he has
